Contrary to the myths propounded by promoters, sports are instruments not for. The argument here is not merely academic. I had never even considered competition as anything but a positive force in our society, but Kohn's case is destabilising.

Synopsis About this title Arguing that competition is inherently destructive can you possibly establish that case in a culture that functions as you say ours does? And then once that happens and we have children growing up to think of each other as potential collaborators, rather than as rivals, rather than as obstacles to their own success – which I think is the tacit lesson of our classrooms and playing fields now – then we can move to the next stage of thinking about political and economic alternatives.
