The sanctions imposed by the Security Council were not punitive measures designed to inflict hardship and pain on the people of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, but were intended to encourage the Government in Belgrade to modify its policy by playing a constructive role in the peace process commensurate with its influence in the region. Maintains its commitment to progressive measures for regional stability and arms control and, if the situation requires, to consider further action. Subsequently, a generalized amnesia along with nationalist interests tended to minimize the lessons learned after the Second World War. Messages from former Yugoslavia national rhetoric is supplemented by religious arguments, however, this enables the nationalists to represent the Muslims as being completely alien and oriental. The unfreezing of funds and assets which could be allocated to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would hopefully enable it to re-establish trade links and commerce with other countries as soon as the sanctions were suspended.
