Chapter 9, Toward a Mission-Based Command and Deployment Structure, a specific traditional police model based in Omaha is used in order to illustrate the various components of a mission-based policing approach. Girls were committed for significantly less serious offenses, had less extensive prior records, were more frequently perceived as above age level in maturity, and were perceived as more aggressive, despite the less serious nature of their committing offenses and prior records.

It is alleged that the boys were then set upon by police dogs with at least two of them throwing gas grenades and used rubber bullets to shoot protesters. First, we will describe the extent to which males convicted for rape are sentenced differently than other male-violent-felons; empirical research into this issue would provide an important test of the "leniency hypothesis."
